Chapter 1: Historical Background on the Twenty-sixth Amendment

Lowering the Voting Age Was Not a New Idea Thomas H. Neale A government report describes the early history of the movement for the eighteen-year-old vote, which began during World War II.	32
Young People Are Mobilizing to Demand the Vote Susan H. Carter A news story reports on a nationwide student movement, LUV (Let Us Vote), that is working to lower the voting age.	41
Teen Voting Would Accelerate Undesirable Changes in the Democratic Process William G. Carleton A professor of political science argues that it is surprising that so many leaders favor lowering the voting age, that the reasons offered for doing so are not valid, and that it would encourage the trend toward a democracy manipulated by the mass media.	46
The Time Has Come to Let Young People Vote Edward M. Kennedy Senator Edward Kennedy argues that because young people are more mature than in the past they should be allowed to vote at an earlier age and that Congress has the power to lower the voting age.	56

A Constitutional Amendment May Not Be Needed to Lower the Voting Age 65

Fred P. Graham

A reporter discusses the movement in Congress to lower the voting age simply by passing a law, rather than by proposing a constitutional amendment.

Changing the Voting Age Will Require a Constitutional Amendment 70

Richard Nixon

President Richard Nixon argues that a provision allowing Americans between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one to vote should not be added to the Voting Rights Act because the Constitution does not give Congress the power to set the voting age so it will be struck down by the courts.

Chapter 2: Constitutional Implications of the New Law

The Voting Rights Act Passed by Congress Is Valid Only for National Elections 79

Hugo Black

The Supreme Court rules in Oregon v. Mitchell that Congress has the authority to permit eighteen-year-olds to vote in national elections, but it cannot set the qualifications for voting in state and local elections.

Congress Can Set a Minimum Voting Age Under the Equal Protection Clause 89

William O. Douglas

Justice Douglas argues that in his opinion Congress had an adequate basis for concluding that eighteen-year-olds are mature enough to vote and that for a state to deprive them of the franchise would be a denial of equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Congress Is Not Authorized to Set a Minimum Voting Age 96

John Marshall Harlan

Justice Harlan argues that no provision of the Constitution authorizes Congress to set voter qualifications in national, state, or local elections.

No Legitimate Reason Exists for States
Not to Allow Voting at Age Eighteen 103

William J. Brennan

Justice Brennan argues that there was ample evidence to support Congress's conclusion that because the exclusion of citizens eighteen to twenty-one years of age from the franchise is unnecessary to promote any legitimate interest the states may have, it would violate the Equal Protection Clause.

Only a Constitutional Amendment Can Override
the States' Right to Set Their Voting Ages 111

Potter Stewart

Justice Stewart argues that since constitutional amendments were required to extend the vote to blacks and to women, an amendment is also needed to extend it to citizens between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one.

Chapter 3: Amendment XXVI and Its Consequences

Teens Have Mixed Feelings About Gaining the Vote 117

Mary Lou Loper

A reporter asks teens how they feel about being able to vote in federal elections, finding that some are angry because they cannot also vote in state and local elections but that others are not especially interested in voting.

The States Are Being Extorted into Ratifying
the Twenty-sixth Amendment 123

James J. Kilpatrick

A well-known conservative columnist argues that the states are being extorted into ratifying the Twenty-sixth Amendment by the threat of having to maintain separate registration records for federal and state elections.

The Majority of Americans Favor
the Twenty-sixth Amendment 128

George Gallup

A Gallup poll conducted during the ratification of the Twenty-sixth Amendment shows that six out of ten Americans favor lowering the voting age to eighteen, although the margin is narrower among some demographic groups.

The Effect of Young Voters on Politics
Is Unpredictable 132

David S. Broder

A few days after ratification of the Twenty-sixth Amendment, a reporter discusses what analysts are saying about the impact the youth vote may have on American politics.

When the Youth Vote Was Young: Student
Voters Had More Impact on Local Elections than on National Elections 142

Clyde Brown and Gayle K. Pluta Brown

A professor of political science discusses the youth vote in Iowa during the first election following adoption of the Twenty-sixth Amendment, noting that it had a greater impact on the 1971 local elections than on the 1972 national election.

Chapter 4: The Youth Vote in Contemporary America

Many State Laws Make It Difficult for College
Students to Vote 155

Adam Doster

In some places student voting has been discouraged through unfair registration laws, distribution of misinformation, red tape, and long lines to vote. But students are beginning to fight back in court and to lobby for reform.

- Students Can Vote in Their College Towns
If They Meet Residency Requirements 162
Greg Abbott
The attorney general of Texas explains the ruling in Symm v. United States (1979), which is the only Supreme Court case ever decided on the basis of the Twenty-sixth Amendment. In this case the Court affirmed a lower court's decision summarily without issuing an opinion.
- The Right of Students to Vote in Their College Towns Is Often Misinterpreted 168
Michael I. Krauss
A law professor argues that some students have been encouraged to vote at their college address in cases where it is illegal or unethical and that they may face future consequences if they do so.
- Students Are Sometimes Given Inaccurate
Information About Voter Registration 172
Elizabeth Redden
Prior to the 2008 presidential election, a county in Virginia issued incorrect information about the consequences for students if they registered to vote away from their home state. Opponents accused the county of trying to discourage student voting.
- The Twenty-sixth Amendment Should Be Repealed 177
Timothy Furnish
A history professor argues that it was a mistake to give the vote to eighteen- and nineteen-year-olds because they are too ignorant about facts and issues of which voters should be aware.
- The Voting Age Should Be Lowered to Sixteen 182
National Youth Rights Association
In an official statement of its policy, the National Youth Rights Association (NYRA) offers ten reasons why sixteen would be a better minimum voting age than eighteen.

Sixteen-Year-Olds Should Become Politically Active to Gain the Vote	192
---	-----

Ralph Nader

Activist Ralph Nader argues that sixteen-year-olds are likely to be more excited about politics than eighteen-year-olds and should be given the right to vote but that a teenage political revolution is needed to make that happen.
